Statistical Methods In Cancer Research The Analysis Of

to several sets of data of importance in the field of cancer epidemiology. We hope to present these new statistical methods in such a way that epidemiologists and other research workers without extensive statistical training can appreciate the possibilities they offer and, in many cases, can apply them to their own work.

cancer. In this respect, studies have explored the utility of microarrays in identifying gene expression signatures" with activated or repressed expression profiles in the disease status as potential diagnostic targets (Dhanasekaran et al., 2001, Luo et al., 2001, Welsh et al., 2001). Another example pertains to genomic studies in breast cancer.
